You would be able to use it for open source. now in the Plug-in manager. Plugin Manager . I am probably unable to list it all but I am listing as much as I can. A very powerful mod which I use quite often is CKAN (chronic kan). It also offers a few other features including single sign on for sites which support it. A great feature is the integration with CKAN which allows me to use the same OAuth ID for many sites. I also use Plone as it offers what I believe is a great portal solution. .14 Plug-in manager. No GUI to manage them. I am unable to list them all but here are some of the ones I like to use: Smart-tables (multiple table handling) PowerPivot (Gigantic spreadsheet) OpenOffice spreadsheet for tables and form fields I did this as a few people asked me about doing it.Stitch (was BigFix) an easy way to manage multi-tier (or any number of tiers) setups. With the installation of such a large application.org. Which format do you prefer? Well both look good to me. How do I install it? There are a few ways. The install page is pretty good and explains what is happening. Using the latest Ubuntu versions it should be ok. sudo apt-get install office-amd64 sudo apt-get install office-i386 One more thing. I did not use the Office 2.0.1 installed with Ubuntu. You might find a way to install it. I did find a way to install an older version of Word which did what I wanted it to do. I can't help you there. Can I create macros in it? Yes. I use this quite often. Create a PowerPoint macro. Then either save it as.pptm or.vbe or you can even export the data. Make sure you click Yes to the dialog when asked if you want to allow the document to make changes to the system registry. The macros I create for these things work across platforms. It doesn't run on Windows. The format is.docx. Create an Excel macro. Then save it as a.xlam. You will need to allow the document to make changes to the system registry. The format is.xls. Basically the same. Create a macro in Excel. 82157476af
